Rhesus monkeys exposed to methylmercury for a prolonged period of time exhibited decreased sperm density. The possible effects of methylmercury on spermatogenesis were therefore studied in wild-type mice. Male mice aged 3 months were intraperitoneally injected with 0.05 or 0.1 mg/kg methylmercury thrice weekly for 6 weeks. Compared with the control mice, the mice injected with the higher dose exhibited significantly decreased body weight and sperm count. Sperm count was significantly lower in the mice injected with the lower dose than in the control mice. The sperm morphologies of the treated mice were normal. The rate of apoptotic cells detected by TUNEL assay was significantly lower in the mice injected with the lower dose than in the control mice. These results suggest that the testis is more susceptible to methylmercury than other organs, and that methylmercury may affect spermatogenesis in a dose-dependent manner./* Copyright (c) 2008-2009 NetAllied Systems GmbH This file is part of MayaDataModel.
